The USF College of Nursing's Mo-Bull Nurse Medical Clinic is designed to improve health by bringing care directly to people where they live and work. It also plays a vital role in preparing future nurses and healthcare providers by offering expanded clinical learning opportunities. These include delivering high-quality, culturally sensitive care in community settings, addressing Social Determinants of Health in local communities, learning how to address them in patient care planning, and fostering a collaborative interprofessional approach to care.

Fully equipped with two exam rooms and vaccine storage space, the clinic is staffed by advanced practice registered nurses (APRNs), a patient care coordinator, community health navigators, and faculty preceptors. It serves as a hands-on clinical training site for undergraduate and graduate nursing students and provides interprofessional learning opportunities for USF Colleges of Public Health and Pharmacy students.

The college is currently seeking external funding to support the sustainability of the Mo-Bull Nurse Medical Clinic.
