

Corey Oshikoya is a certified athletic trainer that has worked with numerous professional athletes and teams in the National Football League. He began his undergraduate work at West Virginia University, in Morgantown, WV. While a student in the university's athletic training program, he help found and was one of the first officers for the program's student athletic training association. After graduating from WVU, Corey attended the research-based graduate athletic training program, at the University of Virginia. His thesis at Virginia was based on ultrasound therapy, and was later published in the Journal of Athletic Training. In addition he provided care and management of athletic injuries for several different sports at both universities.

After Corey's educational studies, he became an assistant athletic trainer for the Denver Broncos Football Club. He currently remains in that position and is entering his 14th season with the team. In 2011, he was named AFC Assistant Athletic Trainer of the Year by the Professional Football Athletic Trainers' Society.

Corey has also been actively involved in the athletic training community. He has presented topics at state and district levels, as well as at the National Athletic Trainers' Association (NATA) Annual Symposium on several topics, including Exertional Rhabdomyolysis and Sickle Cell Trait. He is a member of the Ethnic Diversity Advisory Committee of the NATA and was a member of the NATA's Sickle Cell Task Force.