Pete Walton is Associate Dean for Undergraduate Affairs and Special Projects in the School of Public Health and Health Information Sciences (SPHIS), University of Louisville. His main areas of interest include curriculum and course development and maintenance methodologies; student and faculty academic information systems and instructional technology; critical thinking, neuroscience, and learning in pedagogy; and development of public health workforce. He graduated from Dartmouth College and received an MD degree from the University of Pennsylvania. Walton co-founded and led a company to commercialize electronic medical/health record system developed during earlier research years. After the company was bought by a national healthcare corporation, Walton served as its VP of Information Systems, retiring in 1997. He joined University's faculty in 1999 and is a member of the team founding SPHIS in 2002. He enjoys teaching a general education course, PHUN-101 “Introduction to Public Health,” to undergraduates twice a year. Pete is currently working on an undergraduate BS/BA program in public health offered at the University and a remote MPH program offered in Lahore, Pakistan, both of which are going live in August 2014.
