Betsy McKay is bureau chief in Atlanta for The Wall Street Journal, a position she has held since November 2009. She covers public health. Previously, Ms. McKay was deputy bureau chief and a reporter in the Atlanta bureau, covering the beverage industry and public health. She joined the Journal in September 1996 as a reporter in Moscow and moved to the Atlanta bureau in 1999. Ms. McKay was a founding reporter and editor for The Moscow Times from 1991 to 1993. From 1993 until 1996, she was a reporter from Moscow for Newsweek, The Wall Street Journal Europe, The Moscow Times, Advertising Age, and other publications. Ms. McKay was a member of a team of Journal reporters awarded the 1999 Pulitzer Prize in the international reporting category for in-depth analytical coverage of the Russian financial crisis. She was also part of a team of Journal reporters that won the 2008 Global Health Council Excellence in Media Award for newspapers for a series on the growing public health crisis in China. Born in Albany, N.Y., Ms. McKay received a B.A. from Amherst College and M.A. in Russian language and literature from Bryn Mawr College.
