"Development and Reliability of a Seated Device for Quantifying External Spinal Compression"
James A. Haley V. A. Patient Safety Center, Tampa, FL. 2001-2002

This pilot study was conducted with 22 subjects, using a seated stadiometer developed by the research team. External spinal compression was measured in the AM and PM of day 1 and repeated one week later. There was a significant difference in spinal compression between morning and afternoon measures, but not from week one to the next. Inter-rater reliability between 2 researchers was 0.99 (intra-class correlation). This is a reliable, inexpensive practical way to measure spinal compression. May be used to predict risk factors for back injuries.
